On this panel we plan to report the results of new cross-national surveys conducted in four democratic societies: the US, the UK, Poland, and Canada. The Political Communities Surveys are the first surveys of their kind in that their purpose is to delve deeply into citizens' perceptions of various relevant objects in their polities (political objects), such as their political authorities, their institutions, the workings of their political process, their regime principles, and their political communities. In addition, these surveys are designed to rigorously test a gamut of prominent theoretically relevant explanations for potential variations in political support and to examine a wide range of potential consequences. In this series of papers, we aim to focus specifically on citizens' perceptions of their respective governments' handling of the COVID-19 Pandemic and the various challenges that it introduced. We aim to do so much more extensively than has been done in the past and to do so cross-nationally in four different democratic societies – the US, the UK, Poland and Canada (n=9,200). In addition, we plan in these papers to account for people's different lived experiences and varying dispositions over the course of the pandemic and investigate how such evaluations affected their overall democratic support (both evaluative and affective) for different political objects.

Three-Way Street: US-China-Taiwan Crossover*ThursdayInternational Conflict and Security9:30am-10:50amRoyal - 3rd Floor*

As the 2024 US presidential election approaches, China is once again thrust into the spotlight of American politics, with an increasing number of politicians from across the aisle playing the “China Card.” Despite attempts by both Washington and Beijing to warm up their icy relations, systematic competition continues to persist. On the US side, the establishment of the House Select Committee on the Chinese Communist Party signifies a bipartisan agreement on adopting a firm stance towards China. On the Chinese side, Xi Jinping has expedited military reforms and is building a geopolitical clique with Central Asian states as a countermeasure to the so-called US-led “Anti-China Alliance.” In this dynamic, a significant player is Taiwan, whose assertion of independent identity has grown considerably following the 2019-2020 Hong Kong protests, the 4th Taiwan Strait Crisis, and a series of other Chinese aggressions. While Taiwan has bolstered its self-defense capabilities and worked on better integration into the global supply chain, it has also retained the option of peaceful dialogue with China as a buffer. Notably, the outcome of Taiwan’s 2024 presidential election is likely to substantially shape its post-Covid China policy, introducing complexities and uncertainties to the dynamics of US-China-Taiwan relations. This panel values research that involves comparisons before and after pivotal “critical junctures” in US-China-Taiwan relations in recent years, the interplay between domestic politics and foreign policy, and intricate interactions between politicians and citizens. The panel welcomes a diverse range of methodological approaches and theoretical paradigms that delve into different facets of the panel theme.

Judd Owen, Emory University

Aristotle claims that political science is the science that has as its goal the human good, and thus human flourishing. Beyond the pragmatic management of the state, the proper domain of the political scientist is the care for the citizens' acquisition of moral knowledge and moral conditioning. As such, the work of the political scientist, for Aristotle, is unavoidably ethical work. But this expanded understanding of political science raises difficult questions about how exactly these two apparently distinct realms are related: Does one ground the other? Do the methods of the practice of political science differ from those of ethics? To what degree should both ethics and political science be collaborative endeavors? And to what degree should the complicating forces of luck and nature be acknowledged in these two realms? The papers included in this Ancient Perspectives on Moral Knowledge and Political Science panel aim to present research and foster a conversation around the Ancient Greek understanding of the interwoven nature of ethics and political science, investigating the aforementioned questions and many more related ones. Nicolas Day's paper "Protarchus' Second Sailing in Plato's Philebus" asks which are the appropriate methods for the inquiry into the human good. Through a close reading of Plato's Philebus, he argues that a comprehensive analysis of the class character of reality can't be a precondition for an investigation into the human good. Rather, a preliminary decision about the nature of that good must presuppose any further inquiry into its nature. Jeffrey Patrick Colgan's paper "Lucky by Nature? Luck in Aristotle's Eudemian and Nicomachean Ethics" investigates the role that luck plays in human flourishing. By comparing the treatment of luck in two of Aristotle's treatises and situating luck in relation to nature and the divine, he complicates the way previous scholarship has made political use of Aristotle's treatment of luck and contests the often clumsy ways that luck has been accommodated in political systems. Finally, Stephen Cunniff's paper "What Are Friends Good For? Aristotle on Friendship, Self-Knowledge, and the Joint-Exercise of Virtue" examines the role of friendship in the cultivation of virtue and the pursuit of the good, arguing that friendship serves as an important joint-exercise of virtue grounded in mutual self-knowledge.

This roundtable provides strategies for effectively teaching political science courses on gender, sex, and sexuality. Drawing on the latest research on pedagogy and classroom experiences, roundtable participants will examine how to most effectively teach these topics given current challenges in the American political landscape (e.g., a growing number of states passing trans bans, the Supreme Court rolling back reproductive freedoms, etc.). Roundtable experts will also discuss best practices for teaching gender, sex, and sexuality through an intersectional lens.

This panel would be an undergraduate student led panel that would discuss current issues facing Black Americans in our political system. Students will present different current topics and issues, while make connections to both current academic research as well as the historical connections of how our country originally dealt with the concept of race, especially in the context of the United States Constitution. Topics could include, but are not limited to: the use of Black rappers' lyrics against them in the court of law and if those are violations of the first amendment, how different presidential administrations targeting people of color with specific policies, how the connection between slave patrols and police have led to modern day struggles between Black Americans and police officers, how redlining and gerrymandering continue to negatively impact communities of color, and more.

Panel on the new book, Supreme Bias: Gender and Race in U.S. Supreme Court Confirmation Hearings, released in October 2023 from Boyd, Collins, and Ringhand. Book Summary: In Supreme Bias, we examine the dynamics of gender and race at the Supreme Court confirmation hearings held before the Senate Judiciary Committee. The book uses extensive new data and qualitative evidence to highlight how the women and people of color who have sat before the Committee have faced a significantly different confirmation process than their white male colleagues. Despite being among the most qualified and well-credentialed lawyers of their respective generations, our evidence indicates that female nominees and nominees of color face more skepticism of their professional competence, are subjected to stereotype-based questioning, are more frequently interrupted, and are described in less-positive terms by senators.

Richard Franklin Bensel's The Founding of Modern States is a bold comparative work that examines the dilemmas of foundings in three democratic and three non-democratic states: Britain, the US, France, the Soviet Union, Nazi Germany, and the Islamic Republic of Iran. Bensel argues that new state formations are defined by a metaphysical conception of a 'will of the people' through which the new state is ritually granted sovereignty. The paradoxical nature of modern foundings is embedded in their constitutive moments and in the political myths each regime derives to justify their claim to represent the people's will. Bensel is one of the foremost experts on American political development, but book engages with core debates in not just this subfield but also in comparative politics and political theory. The "critics" and Daragh Grant – each bring a similarly APD and cross-subfield sensibility to their work, as well as a close attention to the role of ideology and myths in constructing political regimes. Robert Mickey (University of Michigan) is an expert on democratic institutions, subnational authoritarianism, and the US South. His current research includes a study of comparative nation-building. Gwendoline Alphonso (Fairfield University) is a scholar of American political development, political parties, legal history, and the politics of the family. Daragh Grant (University of Chicago) studies the history of colonialism and empire, the history of slavery, and the development of understandings of sovereignty and subjecthood from the sixteenth century to the present.

How did Renaissance political thinkers conceive of the relationship between sovereignty, power, political psychology, and institutional forms? How did their divergent understandings of relations between the people and the elites, as well as the institutions that mediated those relationships, shape their visions of political rule? The early sixteenth century provided a variety of political models and institutional frameworks to which humanist thinkers could turn in developing their accounts of power, authority, legitimacy, conflict, and institutional design. This panel seeks to investigate the political writings of Niccolò Machiavelli, Francesco Guicciardini, Jean Calvin, and other legal and public humanists, exploring the diverse contexts and authorial strategies that shaped their writings on political rule and institutional design within the Renaissance state. Our first paper explores Machiavelli and Guicciardini's responses to the wave of popular apocalypticism, religious reform, and institutional transformation that characterized Florence's 'Savonarolan Moment' from 1494 to 1498. Our second paper investigates Calvin's engagement with French humanist thinking on the psychology of political rule, as well as the role of philosophic counsel and popular institutions in cultivating effective restraints on royal power. Our third paper positions Machiavelli's discussion of popular power as a radical critique of humanist legal theorists who sought to reconcile absolutist government with the concept of popular sovereignty. Finally, our fourth paper seeks to explore the evolution of Guicciardini's thought concerning the promises and perils of aristocratic and popular rule amidst the profound instability that afflicted contemporary Florence.

This panel is an author-meets-critics session focusing on Samuel Bagg's newly released book, The Dispersion of Power: A Critical Realist Theory of Democracy. The book is an urgent call to rethink centuries of conventional wisdom about what democracy is, why it matters, and how to make it better. Drawing from history, social science, psychology, and critical theory, it explains why elections do not and cannot realize the classic ideal of popular rule, and why prevailing strategies of democratic reform often make things worse. Instead, Bagg argues, we should see democracy as a way of protecting public power from capture—an alternative vision that is at once more realistic and more inspiring. Despite their many shortcomings, real-world elections do prevent the most extreme forms of tyranny, and are therefore indispensable. In dealing with the vast inequalities that remain, however, we cannot rely on standard solutions such as electoral reform, direct democracy, deliberation, and participatory governance. Instead, Bagg shows, protecting and enriching democracy requires addressing underlying inequalities of power directly. In part, this entails substantive policies attacking the advantages of wealthy elites. Even more crucially, deepening democracy requires the organization of oppositional, countervailing power among ordinary people. Neither task is easy, but historical precedents exist in both cases—and if democracy is to survive contemporary crises, leaders and citizens alike must find ways to revive and reinvent these essential democratic practices for the 21st century.

This panel takes up two closely related themes—leadership and rhetoric—as treated by three ancient political philosophers: Xenophon, Plato, and Aristotle. In their papers, Emily A. Davis and Avery Williams discuss the teachings presented in Xenophon's Education of Cyrus, exploring Cyrus' complex motivations, the hopes his leadership inspires, and the dangers of his rule. Comparing the first chapter of Aristotle's Rhetoric to sections of Plato's Gorgias, Derek Foret differentiates between two kinds of leaders—the judicious rhetorician and the illiberal demagogue—on rhetorical grounds. Finally, Samuel P. Hage draws out the subtle persuasiveness of Socratic rhetoric as seen in Plato's Philebus.

The group of papers on this panel aims to expand and disrupt narratives of Black political participation in the United States. Black American political participation through queer to normative American political behavior is still boxed and not fully explored or considered heterogenous in political behavior. The first two papers in the panel emphasize the influences of Black political behavior. Best, in her exploration of the influence of police behavior on Black women's political behavior, finds that police misconduct is a mechanism for voter turnout. Babalola, using his colonial heritage influence theory, analyzes how colonial legacies impact the political behavior of Black folks in the United States. In the third paper, Roberson explores the relationship between racial resentment and labor union support, using ANES data that indicators of racial resentment and Black uplift are deeply tied to support for labor unions. In the final paper, Crawford theorizes how a politic of the otherwise opens up nonnormative ways to understand rural Black political participation. Overall, this panel highlights how the changing political landscape of the U.S. requires that we also change how we approach Black political participation.

Ben Fan, University of Maryland

Social Identity and Incentives In Epistocracy and Lottocracy

Matt Myers, Tulane University

Why You Have Good Reason to Participate in Local Politics

Cole James, Bowling Green State University

These three papers look at individual voters in democracy and what problems they face. The first paper interacts with proponents who argue that we should not participate in politics. These individuals claim that because we cannot make a difference in politics then we should not participate in it. However, the author of this paper argues that they may be right about national politics but not about local politics for a variety of reasons. The second paper argues that certain institutional changes would neither address rational ignorance nor produce comparatively better policy outcomes. This is because citizens and decision-makers in these new institutions will still face strong incentives to behave in certain ways based on their social identities. The last paper argues When we vote, we send signals about which candidate or political party we support. By and large, the signals of voters are the only signals represented in election results. However, there's reason to think that non-voters are sending signals that are just as important. The author argues that there is untapped political value in discerning what non-voters are signaling.

In addition to the devastating health and financial consequences of COVID-19, the pandemic also affected the political lives of people, upending the administration of elections in both predictable and unpredictable ways. How did the global pandemic affect election administration in the U.S. and to what extent did the political structure of election administration contribute to that? What have we learned from running elections in a time of pandemic and what reforms will stick post-pandemic? How can we utilize these lessons to prevent future electoral challenges and ensure the smooth running of elections during times of national crisis? In this session, contributing authors from the forthcoming volume "Pandemic at the Polls: How the Politics of COVID-19 Played into American Elections" (Lexington Books) will share insights from their original research on the pandemic elections of 2020 with supplementary analysis from the 2022 election. In addition, the session will look ahead to the 2024 elections, in hopes of pre-empting the most pressing challenges facing election administrators. Featuring cutting-edge quantitative and qualitative research from some of the top scholars in U.S. election administration, Pandemic at the Polls (expected early 2024) is a must-read for election administrators, scholars, and students of American elections.

The academy can be fraught with pitfalls, including but not limited to: increasing teaching responsibilities, highly personal battles over tenure and promotion, daunting service obligations, rapidly changing political environments, and colleagues and administrators who may be reluctant to respect personal and professional boundaries. Though these challenges affect all of us, they can be particularly complicated for women, political scientists of color, and those who identify as members of other underrepresented groups. Join SPSA Women and the SPSA Committee on the Status of Women for a panel discussion that will first, review empirical data to illustrate shared challenges, and, second, provide constructive advice for navigating the daily challenges of life as a faculty member. If time allows, we will also consider how to use empirical evidence to compose annual review and tenure documents that acknowledge the challenges we all share.

Evaluating Mechanisms of Redress for Racial Violence in the U.S.: The Applicability of Transitional Justice

Mia Powell, Pennsylvania State University

Cyanne Loyle, Pennsylvania State University, PRIO

Helga Malmin Binningsbø, Peace Research Institute Oslo (PRIO)

A complex history of racial violence has left a harsh legacy on the Black community in the United States. Persistent structural inequities, the oftentimes violent enforcement of White supremacy, and sustained patterns of intergenerational trauma are consequential to contemporary trends in health outcomes, poverty, and political engagement. What role could formal remediation play in mitigating the disparate and lasting impacts of racial violence? Engaging the transitional justice framework prominent in Conflict Studies, we examine the institutional mechanisms most likely to be successful at addressing the legacies of racial violence in the United States. In this paper we bridge the empirical literature on trust and racial attitudes in the US with the theoretical work on reconciliation to discuss the various institutional options for redress.

In the United States, politics has become increasingly nationalized in recent years as voter decision-making is now driven by partisan or national political forces rather than the attributes of individual candidates. Indeed, voters now seem more concerned with which of the two national parties will be in power across all levels of government as opposed to which candidate will represent them individually. The phenomenon has now reached levels unseen since the nineteenth century, when the party ballot was in use and voters were generally unable to select among individual candidates. Nationalized Politics asks and answers the question, "how has nationalization influenced elections across different political eras?" Jamie Carson, Joel Sievert, and Ryan Williamson look at historical variation in nationalization through an analysis of congressional elections from 1840 to 2020. By examining roughly 180 years of elections, the authors leverage considerable differences in electoral competition, electoral rules, nationalization, polarization, and partisan advantage via the incumbency advantage. Moreover, Carson, Sievert, and Williamson employ a unique survey design to capture citizen attitudes toward the nationalization of politics to further consider the question of how nationalization is currently shaping politics. Providing a comprehensive history of US congressional elections, Nationalized Politics illustrates the roots of the current electoral landscape in the US.

This panel examines the intersection of politics and literature, especially with respect to the themes of race and culture. It features papers on artists, thinkers, and political actors who employed rhetoric and literary forms to highlight specific instances of injustice as they sought both to provide stimulus for change and to offer a vision of an inclusive political community. Three of the papers on the topics of Abraham Lincoln's Second Inaugural Address, the writings of the abolitionist/proto-feminist Grimké sisters Angelina and Sarah and W.E.B. Dubois' Black Flame Trilogy examine aspects of American political thought from the perspective of racial and gender inequality, while two others on Shakespeare's Tempest and T.S. Eliot's Four Quartets illuminate the relation between culture and political life more generally. What unites all of these papers is the effort to shed light on how creative figures in the past mobilized their literary and rhetorical skills to advance equality, cultural development, and racial and gender justice.

Administering Justice examines the leadership role of chief justices in the American states, including how those duties require chief justices to be part of the broader state political environment. Vining and Wilhelm focus extensively on the power of chief justices as public spokespersons, legislative liaisons, and reform leaders. In contrast to much existing research on chief justices in the states, this study weighs their extrajudicial responsibilities rather than intracourt leadership. Vining and Wilhelm analyze the reform agendas advanced by chief justices and determine what factors influence the likelihood of success. These analyses confirm that chief justices engage with state politics in meaningful ways and that reactions to their proposals are influenced by ideological congruence with other political elites and the scope of their requests. Administering Justice also examines the chief justice position as an institution, provides a collective profile of its occupants, and surveys growing diversity among court leaders.

Led by authors contributing to the forthcoming “Roads to Congress 2022” book manuscript, this roundtable will evaluate factors that shaped outcomes in the 2022 congressional elections, and explore the political dynamics that are shaping upcoming races in 2024. Key topics for discussion may include: • Reasons for and implications of evolving demographics among Republican Party candidates • Patterns of realignment in the electorate and the political implications of those trends • Innovations in campaign strategies by candidates, parties, and groups • Reasons for and implications of evolving issue cleavages between partisan candidates • Developments in and implications of recent changes in election laws The goals of the roundtable are to promote innovative new research appearing in the ongoing “Roads to Congress” book project, highlight and build synergy between emerging scholarly interpretations of contemporary electoral politics, and provide opportunities for scholars to network and catalyze future collaborative research on campaigns and elections.

Although nation and empire are often cast as opposing political forms, the relationship between the two can be far from straightforward. The tension between national self-assertion and imperial domination, between self-rule and rule over others, can become particularly salient in those states whose images of themselves are centrally tied to claims of popular sovereignty: democratic Athens in antiquity, Britain in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the United States from its inception down to the present. These dilemmas become still more pressing when such states are enmeshed in global economic structures with murky relationships to national publics. The four papers on this panel investigate the imbrications of nation and empire across a wide range of historical cases. Mark Fisher looks at the tension between the "democratic" and "autocratic" interpretations of ancient Athens in the work of Thucydides. Jacob Swanson excavates Alexander Hamilton's writings on public debt, which served simultaneously as a vehicle for American domestic political development and for American assertion on the international stage. Anurag Sinha investigates the politics of commodity boycotts in the hands of both the British Empire and later its Indian nationalist opponents. Emma Stone Mackinnon examines the American statesman Ralph Bunche's attempts to navigate the tensions between his critique of imperialism and his acceptance of moderate forms of managed transition that preserved aspects of colonial hierarchy.

What is understood by judicial activism in different jurisdictions? Beyond a superficial agreement, are we talking about the same phenomenon across countries and systems (or over time), and to what extent? This roundtable introduces a new book that started right here at the SPSA: Judicial Activism in Comparative Perspective. A first book in a new series on comparative law and courts, the book brings together a selection of theoretical and empirical studies across different socio-political and institutional contexts. The chapters not only demonstrate the complexity of the concept, but also illustrate the different meanings of judicial activism across different types of political regimes, legal systems, and judicial institutions. The book looks at three examples from western democracies with common law systems (the U.S., the U.K., and Canada), and then at six examples from civil law systems in Latin American countries with very different experiences with judicial activism, democracy, and liberal constitutionalism: Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, Mexico, Paraguay, and Venezuela. These case studies are analyzed with reference to a common conceptual framework, assisted by a beginning theoretical essay and two concluding cross-national studies highlighting different theoretical and methodological approaches. The roundtable will gather the co-editors and six contributors to the volume, presenting and discussing the series, the book and a selection of individual chapters.

Can we do politics well without manipulating and expressing anger, shame, or other strong emotions? If we could, would emotionless or “positivity only” politics even be desirable? The so-called negative emotions like anger, fear, terror, hate, or resentment seem to play a positive role in human survival. They help us anticipate and avoid situations that threaten our life and health. When we cannot avoid life-threatening situations, these “negative” emotions stimulate us to hide, flee, or fight effectively. Nevertheless, these same emotions also distort our judgment and stimulate us to take very destructive actions, both in private life and in public, political life. This panel considers the boundaries between healthy and unhealthy uses of “strong” emotions in politics. It also questions whether the norms we have developed to govern private emotions should also govern them in public, political contexts.

The rise of illiberal political movements, parties, and intellectual spaces has been pronounced over the last two decades. The concept of illiberalism, while fraught, is increasingly used in scholarship to assess, demarcate, categorize, analyze, and distinguish across new political phenomena in Europe, North America, and elsewhere. This panel brings together a variety of empirical and conceptual-theoretical approaches to comparative illiberalism studies. In doing so, it highlights regional and temporal origins, as well as distinct dynamics in online and print spaces.

On this panel we plan to report the results of new cross-national interviews conducted in various civil society organizations in four democratic societies: the US, the UK, Poland, and Canada. These interviews are the first of their kind in that their purpose is to delve deeply into how the managers of various civil society organizations across several democratic societies recall their performance and capacity to adapt to the challenges presented by the COVID-19 Pandemic. For example, how did the COVID-19 Pandemic change the way that civil society organizations serve the needs of their clients? Were there any service disruptions (and new challenges presented), and was the capacity to respond to the needs of patrons maintained? How did the COVID-19 Pandemic affect the way that these civil society organizations functioned? Did the pandemic affect the way that patrons of civil society organizations viewed the performance and responsiveness of the civil society organizations that they relied on? Were there any changes in the organizational culture and operational conventions within civil society organizations over the course of the pandemic? Were civil society organizations, and the people that work within them, capable of adapting to any challenges or changes that they may have been confronted with during the pandemic? And how did the COVID-19 Pandemic affect the way that civil society networks activated and engaged? Was there enhanced contact and cooperation between civil society organizations, with government and private sector organizations, or were networks unaffected?

American Liberalism has faced many challenges in its history, but some have wondered whether it is sustainable in the 21st century, as several challenges have emerged simultaneously. Among them are increasing political polarization and distrust between political parties, social media misinformation, loss of confidence in election integrity, declining freedom abroad, climate change, and the rapid development of artificial intelligence. This panel will examine challenges to American liberalism, assessing the likelihood of its ability to adapt, and survive, in the 21st century.

The papers in this panel investigate citizen attitudes toward politics in contexts where politics contentious and expressing political beliefs can be costly. Papers by Davis and Turbull, Arriola and coauthors and Grossman and coauthors analyze public opinion in Nigeria and Cote d'Ivoire, where elections are regularly marred by violence, fraud, and intimidation. These papers explore the relationship between this violence, intimidation, and public opinion. Papers by Letsa and Anderson describe and analyze public opinion survey data in authoritarian regimes; their papers focus on Cameroon and the Middle East respectively. They both investigate how citizens in authoritarian states express their political beliefs, and the relationships of these beliefs to various forms of social identity.

Ideological diversity has grown considerably on the political Right within the context of American politics since the Trump election. In addition to changing electoral and party conditions, the intellectual space has expanded into a wider band of contested ideational views and a growing cohort of ideological entrepreneurs with interest in political theory and philosophy, as well as developments in political science and law. This panel focuses on 'illiberal' elements of this wide-ranging ideological field, bringing political theory in dialogue with political science approaches to assess, categorize, question, and explain variations in these new phenomena. In doing so, the panel engages with shifting questions associated with 'liberalism,' 'anti-liberalism,' 'postliberalism,' 'illiberalism,' and broader 'dissident' politics in the modern American context.

This panel investigates the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on people residing on the Gulf Coast. Employing a survey studying trauma, resilience, and opportunity among neighborhoods in the region, developed by behavioral and social scientists of the Rand Corporation, Gulf Coast residents were invited to respond to a series of questions intended to glean information about their post-Covid experience. Among the areas of interest to students engaged in analyzing data resulting from this survey were three themes: 1) The impact of Covid-19 on Food Security during and after the pandemic; 2) the salience of trust in government in the aftermath of the pandemic; and 3) the issue of political efficacy and its determinants during and after the pandemic. Insights from these studies will be shared and discussed via three separate papers to be presented orally by political science undergraduates of Xavier University of Louisiana. As one of the principal investigators (Co-PI) on the NSF grant supporting the collection of these data, I shall moderate this panel, serving as Chair.

COVID-19 and the politics of ageing societies: What have we learned?*SaturdayPublic Policy5:00pm-6:20pm

COVID-19 disproportionately affected older people. Part of the reason was inherent in the virus, but it was also because of the way many societies treated older people, with nursing homes often hotspots of infection. This disproportionate impact on older people also meant that the public health measures of 2020-2021 meant, in effect, that younger people were sacrificing work, education, and enjoyment in order to protect older people. Meanwhile, public health measures often condemned older people to the loss of social support networks. In few recent political debates have the implications and impact of age and ageing politics been so important- or so tangled and obscure. Early in the pandemic, there was an efflorescence of interest in the interaction between ageing, politics, and the pandemic, but since then there have been few efforts to draw lessons about the political status of older people in rich countries. We do not yet have stable answers to basic questions about what caused different approaches to managing COVID-19's impact on older people or what it tells us about the politics of ageing societies. This panel asks what we learned about the politics of ageing from COVID-19: What political power do older people have? How do we understand the impact of COVID-19 on nursing homes and eldercare facilities in different countries? Above all, what have we learned about the status of older people in politics today? The round table is made up of experts in comparative health and ageing policy, and will take an explicitly international and comparative perspective with a strong focus on the United States' experience. All five have published extensively on ageing, health policy, and COVID-19. The goal is to synthesise lessons from different US and international experiences and suggest directions for future research.

Traditionally demagoguery is understood negatively, and political scientists narrowly approach the phenomenon in order to suppress and condemn it. Charles Zug's foundational work breaks with this longstanding tradition. Not only does he argue that our negative conception of demagoguery impairs our ability to objectively investigate demagoguery, potentially blinding us from fully, or even satisfactorily, comprehending the phenomenon, but he also pushes us to accept a degree of demagoguery. He even makes the provocative argument that our founding fathers made constitutional room for demagoguery, when constructing our government and the norms that would surround it. In his view, the negative scholarly bias puts too high of a moral burden on politics and prevents us from seeing how demagoguery may be used in salutary ways to better serve and even save democracy.

Abstract: This panel delves into the multifaceted discourse analysis of Chinese political propaganda through comprehensive analyses on the official resources of the top CCP Leadership. Scholars and researchers employ a range of advanced analytical methods, including quantitative and qualitative analysis, to uncover the intricate messaging strategies used by various CCP actors. By examining language, rhetoric, symbolism, and narrative construction, the panel uncovers motives and underlying agendas in official communications of China's higher echelons. The results contribute to a deeper understanding of how the CCP elite open source media shapes political landscapes, policy making processes, and power dynamics in contemporary China.
