Presentations and Collaborations

As President of research4impact (and "chief matchmaker") I have created over 300 new collaborations between researchers & practitioners and between researchers & local policymakers since 2018. In 2021 we doubled the number of new collaborations relative to the previous two years.

Each year, I conduct between 50-100 strategy meetings with foundations, nonprofit organizations, and government leaders to talk about topics related to collaboration in civic life, and strengthening connections between science and society.

Dozens of in-person and web-based presentations to practitioners and researchers on research translation, civic engagement, and collaboration (included in the Presentations section below)

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

Personal statement of research and practice goals, objectives, and impact

A vibrant democracy demands collaboration. My research focuses on when, why, and how individuals with diverse forms of expertise and lived experience work together to solve problems of mutual concern, such as improving the health of their local community and directly addressing many of the social determinants of health. The types of collaborations I focus on are largely between researchers and community leaders such as nonprofit practitioners, advocates, organizers, and local policymakers. In addition to advancing the science of collaboration I spend considerable time putting my and others' research findings into practice as president of research4impact, a nonprofit organization that connects researchers, practitioners, and policymakers. Since 2018 I have created over 300 new collaborations and also led dozens of workshops across the world to help people implement the science of collaboration in their own organizations, educational institutions, and workplaces.
